

Algorithmic aspects of discrepancy

Nikhil Bansal, Technische Universiteit Eindhoven

Recently there has been a substantial progress on algorithmic aspects of combinatorial discrepancy. The algorithms are based on techniques from optimization, random walks and convex geometry and besides being interesting by themselves, they have led to several new results in computer science and in discrepancy itself.

In this talk, I will survey these developments and describe the main ideas behind them.