

On the range of scales in the route to turbulence

Dwight Barkley, University of Warwick

Understanding the transition to turbulence in shear flows is complicated by the range of scales involved in the process. In this talk I will review our current knowledge of structures and dynamics on various scales. I will show that we now have a good understanding of most features of the transition process, but point to areas where future computation and theory could be highly beneficial