

Accelerated statistical image reconstruction for X-ray CT

Jeffrey Fessler, University of Michigan

Statistical methods for image reconstruction in X-ray CT are of increasing interest because of their potential for reduced X-ray doses. The computation times of iterative methods is a significant challenge for their widespread utilization. This talk will describe recent developments in accelerating optimization methods for image reconstruction.